It should be pointed out that some of the options mentioned for hosting the L-II project code would require a change in version control system (VCS). For example, moving to GitHub would mean a change from Subversion to Git. This is significant because subversion is a centralized VCS while git which is a distributed VCS. So the developer community would need to adapt accordingly; how much will depend on each developer's skill and experience.

This isn't meant to imply a switch from subversion to git should be ruled out. GitHub is a feasible option IMHO for the new home for L-II code. But switching to git will require additional learning for developers. We just need to be aware of this sort of consequence while identifying and evaluating options.
