Dear All:

We are switching to GitHub.

There are many reason, the chief one being that Google has made such a transition very easy for repository managers.

We will do a test export on April 30. That will give us a chance to practice and test drive GitHub. Assuming there are no disasters, the final export will be in June or July.

I'll keep you updated as the process evolves and will share fun YouTube GitHub videos, etc.

Last Thursday, Google announced its intent to shut down Google Code. The announcement includes the dates of various phases of the service shutdown. The key one is August 15 of this year -- that's when Google Code will switch to read-only mode. Commits to the Subversion repository will be no longer be possible. So before that date, we the developer community, need to find a new home for hosting the L-II project (i.e., source code repository, issues, developers wiki). We'll need to identify possible options, evaluate them, and select one, so we can develop a transition plan for the new hosting service with as minimal disruption to our development activities.
